

Asda completes £600m deal to buy Co-op's petrol forecourt business

Asda has completed a deal worth around £600m to buy the Co-op's petrol forecourt business.

The supermarket, which is owned by the billionaire Issa brothers and TDR Capital, said 2,300 workers will move over from the Co-op to the group.

The new focus in forecourts and convenience stores comes after Asda's £6.8bn takeover by the billionaire brothers and their private equity backer, who also own the EG Group forecourt giant.

In August, the Co-op first revealed plans to sell its 132 petrol stations and attached convenience stores in a bid to bolster its finances.

The Co-op said proceeds from the sale will be reinvested into its core convenience shops, pricing, stores operations and reducing its debt burden.

The UK competition watchdog is expected to look into the acquisition.

The Competition and Markets Authority (CMA) forced Morrisons' new owner, US private equity firm Clayton Dubilier & Rice (CD&R), to sell off a number of petrol forecourts earlier this month over competition concerns.

Asda said the CMA has already issued an initial enforcement order, meaning the Co-op sites must remain separate until any probe is completed.

The company said this process is likely to “take until mid-2023”.

Mohsin Issa, co-owner of Asda, said: “We are delighted to formally complete the transaction that we announced in August and taking the next step on our journey to creating a new and exciting part of our Asda business.

“As millions of families deal with the day-to-day impacts of increasing costs of living, we’re committed to bringing Asda’s great-value groceries and fuel to even more communities across the UK through these new stores.

“We look forward to working collaboratively with the CMA on their investigation and to welcoming our new Asda colleagues to our great business in the coming months.”
