

Festival of tech returns to Birmingham

A festival of tech and business will return to Birmingham next month. Birmingham Tech Week, which runs from October 10 to 14, will again host a series of events and workshops at venues across the city.

The festival will offer investment opportunities, access to support, networking and digital skills for anyone interested in the digital ecosystem or working in technology.

It will give startups, scaleups, established firms, developers, entrepreneurs and training providers the chance to network and engage with business leaders from the tech industry.

West Midlands Tech Awards 2022

The West Midlands Tech Awards is back for 2022 and is now open for entries.

The event will be held at Millennium Point in Birmingham on Thursday December 15 and will celebrate businesses and individuals across a broad range of categories.

Click through here for all the details and to enter before our deadline of Friday October 21.

Sponsorship opportunities are also now available – please email alishia.read@reachplc.com for details or if you have any other questions and follow the hashtag #WMTechAwards for updates on social media.

Among the planned sessions are a scale-up summit, a digital skills symposium and an awards ceremony to celebrate the region's tech successes. Artificial intelligence, robotics and big data are all tabled for discussion among other topics.

Confirmed speakers include West Midlands Mayor Andy Street, property group Bruntwood SciTech's chief executive Kate Lawler and Melissa Snover, founder of vitamin firm Melissa Snover.

Around 5,000 attendees are expected to attend Birmingham Tech Week. It is estimated the West Midlands has nearly 6,000 tech companies employing a workforce of more than 38,000 people.

Yiannis Maos, founder of Birmingham Tech, the organisation responsible for delivering the festival, said: "The week was founded on encouraging collaboration, celebrating regional success and inspiring people from all walks of life to get into technology. We are really excited about this year's festival as the region's tech sector has seen a real transformation and the week will act as a catalyst for future growth."

Read More

Related Articles

▪

Birmingham credit union falls in administration

BusinessLive

Read More

Related Articles

▪

New MD as MFG Solicitors rings the changes

BusinessLive

Mr Street added: “Birmingham Tech Week has become a real highlight in the city’s business calendar which is apt given the West Midlands’ status as the UK’s fastest-growing tech sector. After millions tuned in to enjoy the spectacular Commonwealth Games, this is a great time to be pitching all that our region has to offer, including our impressive tech credentials, while also building strong relationships with fellow tech hubs overseas.

“It was fantastic to play host to the inaugural Commonwealth Esports Championships this summer which underscored how we are in many ways a natural fit for the fast-growing esports industry given the tech sector is one of our strong suits thanks to our talent base and innovation capabilities.

“I look forward to productive discussion around how we can take the tech sector to the next level and make the most of the genuine opportunities ahead of us in the coming months and years.”

READ NEXT:

- See all our latest technology news here
- Trio of firms pivot expertise to help aviation go greener
- BT launches major recruitment drive at Birmingham hub
- US group snaps up HR tech platform
- Microsoft to work on Commonwealth Games legacy tech project