Tony Shaw, managing director of Henry Boot Construction, said: “We are thrilled to add this development to our growing portfolio of major urban development schemes. City centres are changing rapidly, and we understand the important role that quality residential has to play in their regeneration.”

Overlooking York’s iconic landmarks – as one of them – it also enjoys views over the surrounding countryside.

Built by Joseph Rowntree in the early 1890s, it was described as a ‘garden factory’ a place where open space and education facilities supported workers and families.

Latimer said it will revitalise gardens and communal space, with an onsite coffee shop and grocery store.

Through consultation it engaged with The Rowntree’s Society, the community and past employees as it set about bringing the scheme forward.

Prior to the purchase in 2018 it had lain empty for more than a decade.

Richard Cook, group director of development for Latimer, said: “Real links with the past is what makes The Cocoa Works a very special project for Latimer.

“With great care, we’re re-establishing a community and giving fresh life to a heritage building that’s been the soul of York for more than 130 years.”

A sixth floor roof extension will house the deluxe penthouses, while the refreshed layout is described as sympathetic to the building’s previous life.

“Design features that reference the past enhance the feeling of being part of the history of this incredible building,” Mr Cook said.

Private co-working space is also planned , with concierge facilities to be available.

Marketing of the Haxby Road homes within has begun, with prices ranging from £174,000 to £595,000.
