

Elon Musk's X back up after outage

The website and phone app for Elon Musk's X (formerly Twitter) appear to have been restored after going down.

Earlier, users were still able to open the service but were faced with a message reading "welcome to your timeline", instead of the usual feed of posts.

Spaces, where people can take part in voice chat debates, remained functional.

Tens of thousands of reports about the technical issues were filed on DownDetector.

Posts from users on their own profiles were also not showing up on the site and app.

However, the platform did appear to allow users to continue posting, despite the content not showing up.

#TwitterDown began trending shortly after 6am.

Read more from Sky News:

Tips to help your broadband speeds at Christmas

Google to pay compensation to millions of customers

Be the first to get Breaking News

Install the Sky News app for free

sky

Users of X Pro, which replaced Tweetdeck, also reported issues using the service.

Advertisement

Elon Musk bought the platform in a $44bn (£33.6bn) deal last year and later renamed it from Twitter to X.