

Johnson strives for gender equality with new line-up of business advisors

Downing Street will next week unveil a gender-balanced line-up of business advisers to Boris Johnson, which includes the bosses of some of Britain's fastest-growing technology companies.

Sky News has obtained the list of members of the prime minister's new business council, which is expected to be published as early as Monday.

Half of its 28 members are to be women, according to the list, an increase in the proportion of female members from last year's Build Back Better Council, which was convened by Mr Johnson and Rishi Sunak, the chancellor, in January 2021.

The new council will include Alice Bentinck of Entrepreneur First, Greg Jackson, founder and chief executive of Octopus, the energy supplier, and Dame Anne Richards, chief executive of Fidelity International.

Baroness Shields, the Conservative peer who runs Benevolent AI, Joanna Swash, founder of the professional services business Moneypenny, and Nigel Toon, boss of the artificial intelligence-led chipmaker Graphcore, are also on the list.

Advertisement

Earlier this week, Sky News revealed that Downing Street had issued invitations to corporate chiefs in recent days about holding regular meetings on the economy with Mr Johnson in 2022.

FTSE-100 chiefs involved in the new council are Amanda Blanc, the Aviva chief executive; Ben van Beurden, the Shell chief executive; Alison Brittain, CEO of Whitbread; Charlie Nunn, CEO of Lloyds Banking Group; Julie Brown, the Burberry finance and operating chief; Paula Rosput Reynolds, National Grid chair; and Anita Frew, the Rolls-Royce chair.

More on Boris Johnson

Boris Johnson and Rishi Sunak confirm controversial National Insurance tax hike will go ahead

Russia-Ukraine tensions: UK to deploy troops across Europe as fears grow Putin will choose 'path of bloodshed and destruction' by invading Ukraine

Boris Johnson: The former 'red wall' towns where people want to move on from partygate

Related Topics:

- Boris Johnson

However, the list is less heavily biased towards those running Britain's biggest listed companies than previous versions of prime ministerial advisory groups have been.

Microsoft, Scottish Power, Starling Bank, Turntide Transport, Forth Ports, Citi, D-Drill, Fujifilm, Oxford Nanopore, Matillion, Iceland Foods, Virgin Atlantic and AGS Airports, the owner of Glasgow and Southampton airports, will all be represented.

The council will be launched amid continuing doubts about the fate of Mr Johnson's premiership.

Mr Johnson's Build Back Better Council met for the final time last month, with some members privately expressing private scepticism about the value of the engagements with ministers.

The PM's relationship with the business community during his tenure as PM has been volatile, with a speech to the CBI's annual conference late last year ridiculed after he repeatedly lost his way.

Please use Chrome browser for a more accessible video player

2:02

PM loses place in speech, uses Peppa Pig joke

Downing Street has been contacted for comment about the full line-up, but in response to initial details of the council earlier this week, a No 10 spokesman said: "The prime minister's Build Back Better Business Council completed its twelve month term at the end of last year.

"The Council provided valuable insight and input into key government priorities.

"The prime minister will shortly launch a new business council, with a refreshed brief, to build on the success of the Build Back Better Business Council. Further details will be set out in due course.

"As with the Build Back Better Business Council, the new business council will be chaired jointly by the prime minister and chancellor."