

London is 'empty' of tourists because of UK own goal on travel rules, Ryanair boss claims

Ryanair's chief executive has told Sky News the UK should scrap its "bizarre" rules governing foreign travel, saying they are holding the country's economy back.

Michael O'Leary was speaking as the airline revealed 14 new routes from London airports for the looming winter season.

Ryanair said its investment decision was based on expectations that demand for foreign travel would continue to build in the coming months – potentially hitting 11 million passengers in October – following a strong end to the summer holidays and 18 months of COVID-19 disruption.

Mr O'Leary said in an interview following a news conference in central London that it was clear the UK capital was "empty" of tourists because of rules governing foreign travel, including PCR testing demands, that were putting people off short breaks.

He added: “Business is being hampered by this continuously chopping and changing of traffic lights that just cause confusion whereas the rules should be simple: if you’re double-vaccinated no restriction and if you’re not double-vaccinated get tested,” he said.

Mr O’Leary argued it was a system that EU governments had adopted to help demand rebound.

Among the locations which will be served from Luton are Gran Canaria (Spain), Naples (Italy) and Grenoble in France.

Mr O'Leary said: "Ryanair is committed to rebuilding London's tourism industry, jobs and connectivity as we grow across Europe and recover air travel to pre-COVID levels."

He also told reporters that air fares would remain "much lower" than before the coronavirus pandemic though expected that situation to change next year as demand continued to recover.
