

NHS urges doctors to halt some blood testing as UK is hit by vial shortage

The NHS has been forced to temporarily halt some blood testing after being hit by a shortage of vials.

Becton Dickinson (BD), which makes test tubes for the NHS, warned that serious supply chain issues across the UK was delaying the production of vials.

In a memo sent to staff, the NHS told doctors to slow down regular blood tests if it was safe to do so. NHS Wales has communicated similar advice.

The guidance states that doctors can scale back some screening for blood disorders, pre-diabetes, and allergies, in addition to deferring routine infertility testing for all patients under the age of 35.

Routine wellness screening is named as another low priority area. The guidance also advises against stockpiling tubes.

Advertisement

The coronavirus pandemic has dramatically increased demand for blood tubes, according to BD, and this was exacerbated by a backlog of routine blood testing that hospitals were now trying to catch up with.

The UK's supply chains have been hit in recent weeks by a perfect storm of a huge shortfall of lorry drivers, a lack of EU workers post-Brexit, and staff being forced to isolate, disrupting the supply of dozens of items from milk, to peri-peri chicken, and now medical equipment.

More from Business

Virgin Money runs into row over closure of charitable arm

Chip shortage and pandemic see car production slump to lowest July level since 1956

Government picks Facebook-critic lawyer to head privacy watchdog

Internet cookie requests could be on their way out under plans to overhaul UK data laws

Greggs becomes latest food business hit by supply chain problems

Mike Ashley's successor as Frasers Group chief executive in line for potential £100m pay package

Greggs became the latest food outlet to be hit by supply chain problems on Wednesday with some products containing chicken missing from its shelves.

The bakery giant said it was seeing "temporary interruptions" in the supply of some ingredients.

It came a day after McDonald's pulled milkshake and bottled drinks from its menu due to supply issues.