

Weetabix workers to strike – and union says it will result in cereal shortages

Workers at two Weetabix plants are to stage strike action later this month in a dispute over contracts, trade union Unite said.

Members of the union working as engineers will walk out for 48 hours from 21 September.

This will be followed by strikes on the same day every week throughout the autumn until 30 November.

Image:

Unite said the strikes would result in production delays
Unite said the strike would cause “widespread delays to production and lead to shortages of Weetabix and other popular products made at the factories including Alpen, Weetos and Oatibix”.

Sky News has contacted Weetabix for comment.

Advertisement

Unite said the industrial action was being carried out “in opposition to the company’s plans to fire and rehire them on vastly inferior contracts”.

It claimed that workers faced changes to shift and working patterns which would result in some being up to £5,000 a year worse off.

More from Business

Halfords reports uphill climb for cycling sales as supply chain disruption bites

Exclusive: Ministers bowed to pressure to drop key climate commitments for UK trade deal with Australia

Amazon moves to defend UK tax contribution after bonanza COVID crisis sales

Boeing board to face investor lawsuit over 737 MAX oversight ‘lies’ before crashes

Online retail giant Very Group hunts new chair in precursor to £4bn float

Hiking national insurance will raise 'enough money' to pay for social care reforms in England and is 'a very Conservative thing to do', says Sajid Javid

Unite's recently-elected general secretary Sharon Graham said: "The idea of 'fire and rehire' is abhorrent to me.

"If Weetabix decide to go down this route and they overstep the line then I will absolutely defend our members."

Image:

Sharon Graham is Unite's new general secretary. Strike action had originally been scheduled for June but was postponed to allow for talks with the company.

Those talks led to new proposals being put to the workers – which were overwhelmingly rejected in a ballot.